Notes

An important collection of manuscript maps of the State of Presidi in Tuscany, at the time part of the Kingdom of Naples, and primarily produced by Ludwig Wilhelm Friedrich von Oeschelwitz (d1766), an Austrian officer renowned for his contributions to military cartography. This collection likely represents a significant portion of the Austrian army's topographical campaign under the direction of Baron Samuel von Schmettau (1684-1751), author of the first “modern” map of Sicily, drawn with advanced astronomical, geodetic, and topographical knowledge.

The volume contains Ludwig Wilhelm Friedrich von Oeschelwitz’s surveying work during the Austrian campaign in Italy. The work principally focuses on the “Stato dei Presidi” with meticulous attention to the fortified citadel of Orbetello. The majority of the plans are signed by the author, including a small text of 18 leaves. During the War of the Spanish Succession (1700-1713), the “Stato dei Presidi” was occupied by the Austrians, to whom it was assigned by the Peace Treaties of Utrecht (1713) and Rastatt (1714). From 1707 to 1733, it was administered by the Habsburgs and ruled by their viceroys, from Naples.

The volume consists of 25 maps, plans, and profiles. The work begins with a general map of Italy, marking the route of the Austrian army, together with the State of Presidi. There follow a further 18 plans, profiles, and maps of towns and fortifications in Presidi. The final six plans comprise: one plan of Pescara, in Abruzzo, on the Adriatic coast, then part of the Kingdom of Naples; two plans of Fort Capua north of Naples; two plans of Castello di Baia, on the Bay of Naples; and one plan of Castel Nuovo, in Naples.

Historical Context

The War of the Quadruple Alliance, which lasted from late 1717 to early 1720, was fought by the Kingdom of Spain against Great Britain, France, Austria, and the Netherlands for dominance of the Mediterranean Sea.

King Philip V of Spain, frustrated by the loss of his Italian possessions after the War of the Spanish Succession, invaded Sardinia, which had become an Austrian possession, in August 1717, and Sicily, which had passed to Victor Amadeus II, Duke of Savoy, in July 1718. The Spanish king took advantage of the power vacuum created in France after the death of Louis XIV and the fact that Austria was engaged in the Austro-Turkish War of 1716-1718. Under the pretext of the Sicilian people’s hostility to the House of Savoy, a Spanish army landed in Sicily, then just recently under Savoy rule, on July 3, 1718. It first conquered Palermo and then occupied the whole of Sicily. The city of Messina was an exception, and it remained under siege until September 1718.

After the Peace of Passarowitz (July 21 1718), between the Austrians and the Ottomans, Austria entered the anti-Spanish alliance, which became the Quadruple Alliance. This was an agreement between states which was intended to ensure a balance of power among the European powers. Emperor Charles VI renounced any claims to the Spanish throne and agreed to an exchange between Sicily (in Savoy hands) and Sardinia, as well as the creation of a Bourbon dynasty in Italy. These decisions now had to be submitted to Spain, and so they were sent to the Spanish court with the threat of a declaration of war if they refused.

On December 17, 1718, Spain definitively rejected the conditions set by the Quadruple Alliance, and war was officially declared. It also spread to Spain’s colonies in South America, where Great Britain attempted to gain advantages, but by the end of the year, only Austria and Great Britain were at war with Spain (France and the Netherlands did not enter the war until 1719).

During 1719, Austria managed to reconquer Sicily: the Austrian army, commanded by Claude Florimond d’Argenteau, Count of Mercy (1666-1734), first attacked the Sicilian city of Francavilla and later succeeded in conquering Milazzo. It then reconquered Messina and established a position opposite Palermo. On February 20, 1720, the Treaty of The Hague was signed, ending the war. Hostilities in Palermo were suspended immediately thereafter with the Convention of Palermo (1720).

Wilhelm Friedrich von Oebchelwitz's

Ludwig Wilhelm Friedrich von Oebchelwitz, about whom very little biographical information is available — it is known that some of his drawings were engraved by artists such as Jacob van der Schley and published in The Hague by Pieter de Hondt — likely travelled to Sicily, in the late 1710s with the Austrian army, where he undertook surveys of the principal fortified towns, aiming to provide commander Claude Florimond d'Argenteau with a detailed map of the island. Following Austria's successful capture of Sicily, Oebchelwitz followed the army's journey through Italy. He would continue to have a long and successful career in the army, with plans being published after his surveys as late as the 1760s.
